Atmospheric scientists call this shift the Suess effect and the change in isotopic ratios of carbon due to fossil-fuel use is easy to see over the last century. Comment on this Story. They address a number of misconceptions about studying the past, and present several ways we might test for a pre-human Earth civilization.

That, of course, begs a deeper question. Jupiter, Venus and the young moon. That's the essence of what makes science so exciting. As in the well-known Kardashev scale – often invoked in discussions of possible alien civilizations – Frank and Schmidt define a prior earthly civilization by its energy use. It also provides a background for astrobiologists studying other planets. The best we could hope to find are minor, inconclusive anomalies in sedimentation now, it has been assumed that one planet would give rise to one intelligent species capable of advanced technology and communications.
