I recommend it for people who are concerned with the role of This is very important book. Sands is right that, as some aspects of international law have become increasingly subject to the influence of other actors, the United States no longer feels comfortable with them and thus believes that they are no longer in its interests.

The author clearly values international law and makes a strong case for it, with Making and Breaking Global Rules. He lives in London with his wife and three children.

The chapters on trade and investment reveal how biased these rules are in favor of the United States. One might think it is a good thing - certainly Europe does - but that does not make it any more likely to happen.
